PASSAGE A | Grandparents and the Community Learning Club

At the Riverside Community Learning Club, teenagers and older residents meet every Saturday morning. The club began in 2021 when a local teacher noticed that many young people wanted practical skills, while retired neighbours were looking for more opportunities to meet others. The first meeting attracted only twelve people. Today, the club usually welcomes more than forty visitors each week.

At the beginning of every session, everyone chooses an activity. Some teenagers learn how to repair bicycles, while others practise cooking simple dishes. Older residents often teach these skills, but the lessons are not one-way. Teenagers help their neighbours learn to use smartphones and send photographs to relatives who live far away. Both age groups say that exchanging knowledge makes them feel useful.

The organisers interviewed thirty club members last spring. Twenty-two said they had made a new friend from a different generation. Eighteen reported that they now spoke to an older family member more frequently. These were responses to a small local questionnaire, so they should not be treated as results for the whole country. However, they suggested that regular conversations might strengthen relationships.

One participant, Mina, used to avoid talking to her grandfather because she thought they had nothing in common. After attending a gardening workshop, she discovered that he had worked on a farm for many years. She now calls him every Sunday to ask about growing vegetables. She says that listening carefully is more helpful than trying to impress him with difficult words.

Not everyone can attend the club each week. Some members work at weekends and others need to care for young children. To include these people, the organisers prepare a free monthly newsletter. It describes upcoming meetings and shares short stories from members. The club hopes to open a second group next year, but that plan still depends on finding another suitable room.

PASSAGE B | Do Digital Messages Make Friendships Stronger?

Keeping friendships strong can become difficult when people move to different cities. A short message may help, but different people expect different kinds of contact. At Hilltop College, a student group asked 68 volunteers how they kept in touch with friends after leaving school. This informal project did not measure the quality of every friendship. It simply described what the volunteers said.

Some students liked sending pictures or short voice messages because these methods were quick and convenient. Others preferred a longer video call once a month. One student explained that her closest friend often worked late, so she rarely expected an immediate reply. They arranged a call on the first Sunday of each month instead. The important point for them was keeping a regular promise, not talking every day.

The project also found that friendships need attention away from screens. Several volunteers said they met friends at a sports centre or cooked together when they lived nearby. These activities gave them something enjoyable to discuss later. However, a few participants felt stressed when they saw friends spending time with other people online. They sometimes misunderstood photographs and believed they were being excluded.

A college counsellor who read the responses suggested asking clear questions rather than making quick assumptions. If a friend does not reply, they may simply be busy. The counsellor also encouraged students to respect different communication habits. The results did not prove that technology improves or damages friendship. Instead, they showed that trust, realistic expectations and shared activities can all play a part in maintaining relationships.

12 Exam practice: short-answer reading

5. What should friends respect about one another?
